I am related to kings, queens, presidents and Native Americans. I am Italian, French,

Scottish, etc. I married a Sicilian/American. So, you would think that we have similar foods that we cook, right? Well, similar, yes. However, different as well. Since my family is more varied, and our families come from different parts of Italy, you will find recipes for the same food, with a slightly different twist. It has been said that the last piece of a culture to remain, after it has been assimilated into a new country, is the food. Through time and generations, we lose track of where family traditions came from, who started certain recipes, and many of the family jokes and legends. It is very sad to think of the loss of a family member. We will always remember all of the smiles, the trips that we took together, jokes that were told, even the fights that we had. However, through time, and through the passing of generations, so much is lost. This cookbook is my attempt to keep a little piece of that family history alive...and to share it with you. Maybe you will find a piece of your family here as well.

Things We Love Sep 13 2021 Every country can be defined by the food they eat, and how they prepare and cook this food. The same is true for different states within many countries, or even down to particular regions. The extraordinary range of differing food preferences of the population of each country, state or region has an uncanny knack of capturing the essence of each area's personality, whether stodgy, optimistic, mean, generous, pleased with themselves, bold, passionate, laconic, pride in what they do, risk-takers, disciplined, over-bearing, particular, unimaginative, creative, challenging; and the list goes on. This book richly captures the unique and powerful personality of those wonderful people who make up Australia's cattle station region; that vast, rugged and unforgiving yet mystical wilderness that is our cattle station country. These cattle station recipes and stories bring alive the optimistic, resilient, sharing, enterprising, self-confident, risk-taking, creative, laconic and proud free spirits that characterise our cattle station communities.
